The Unseen Struggle of a Mother:

I was born in my mother's rural hometown. It required her to travel farther than where my Grandma was staying. This happened just two days before my birth. Some of our relatives were there during this time. My mother started experiencing labor pains on the day of my birth and went to the hospital. The doctor suggested waiting a little longer for delivery. They were nearby and still had time.

Anticipating a strike the next day, those around them decided on a course of action. At midnight, the pain grew slightly stronger. They decided it would be best to admit them to the local hospital. I entered the world on November 30, 1995, at 8:30 am when they arrived at the hospital the next morning. My mother was only 17 years old at the time. During those days, it was challenging to afford delivery expenses and postoperative care. They stayed in the hospital for almost a week and more. The day after my birth, my father informed by our relatives through a speed post letter. There were no text messages or phone calls back then.

The Precious Bond Between Father and Unborn Child:

The sense my father's immense joy and pride as he held me for the first time. To him, I was like a priceless gift. Even when I was still in my mother's womb, he took care of us in every way possible. He wanted to do everything he did to support and protect my mother. I was my father's cherished princess, his little queen. He had a strong desire for the well-being of his unborn child and went to great lengths to ensure my mother's pregnancy was healthy. Spending a significant amount of money on proper nutrition for a baby back then was not an easy task, but he did it without hesitation. He provided carrots, dairy, and other nourishing foods to ensure that I would grow up to be healthy and fair.

"The goodness of a father is greater than the mountain. A mother's goodness is as deep as the sea."
